As a former commercial broadcaster, I find it unnerving that the very industry that has swallowed station after station into conglomerate ownership and has subsequently sucked the very life out of what once was a wonderful and exciting medium is now wanting to halt satellite radio from providing local traffic and weather. it's absurd! These station conglomerates that shut down local stations, move studios from several small towns to a home base, and then even use satellite syndication to further isolate communities from the medium now want to keep satellite radio from serving the markets they've abandoned? Please keep commercial broadcasters at bay -- we've already deregulated ourselves into homogenization, so at least give me a choice as to where I get my information.
